About the author

Adrian Kosmaczewski has been writing software for the past 20 years. He started working professionally in 1996, riding the first and second waves of the web. He has shipped web applications using various technologies, as well as desktop systems for Mac OS X, Windows and Linux. He is also a regular speaker at technical conferences, and provides training and support to new developers all over the world.

Adrian started writing Cocoa applications for the Mac in 2002, and has been writing iOS apps since he returned from WWDC 2008. Adrian is the founder of akosma software, with a strong focus in all things iOS.

He has studied physics in Switzerland and economics in Buenos Aires, and holds a Master in Information Technology with a specialization in Software Engineering from the University of Liverpool. When not writing software, Adrian likes to spend time with his wife Claudia. He updates his blog "Open Kosmaczewski" and his Twitter account @akosma as often as possible and is happy to have new followers every day.

Preface

Writing a book these days means, inexorably, offering an electronic version to your readers.

Over the past few years, I've been trying most typesetting systems out there, from LaTeX to Pandoc and, finally, AsciiDoc, which is the one I've finally chosen to standardize my documents. It turns out I'm not the only one, as many large book publishers use AsciiDoc these days to produce their titles.

This template provides a simple starting point for companies and individuals to create an eBook. Please follow the instructions in the README.md file to install the required software.

I look forward to read your next bestseller in as many platforms as possible!

Oron-la-Ville, January 2012.
